John has settled in and is an affable and well meaning person; however, I suspect he thinks he is always right - and this is a disadvantage both in school and in the house.

Name J. C. R. Collis.

He took a little while to find his true level in the house, but it is not easy to come in late, and he now seems better established. He has something to learn about human relations on the lines of his tutor's remarks!

The new work has not been easy for him but there has been some improvement, with less hot air & more action. There is much for him to do regarding written work. He has little idea of how it ought to be presented & its content frequently includes meaningless phrases & circular arguments. On every occasion he must think before he writes (or speaks) — & when he doesn't know what the answer should be, he must take the trouble to go to his textbook to find out for himself

A particularly good student, in that his questions are always to the point. He can, however, produce some silly mistakes.

He is an amiable boy, and pleasant to teach. His work is rather below average in standard, but this may be a function of his recent arrival at this school.

He certainly appears willing, and if he wants to do well, and will work for it, I think he may do well. He must try to be more precise in all respects.

His very first work left me in some doubt as to his capabilities. Since then he has impressed me in every sphere of the course, and his attitude is refreshingly honest.

He has worked with great industry and enjoyment: the term has seen him steadily improving in organising his ideas well before committing himself to the materials

He has tried hard in this new course to think in a positive way and he has been very good in discussion periods. The standard of his English construction & spelling is very weak
