Some warning signals here, on which I expect him to act. I congratulate him on his appointment as a Sixth.

There are two comments here about unwillingness to read, and he knows my views, and the weight I attach to reading as the key to all academic success; now perhaps he'll realise it's not just me!

Behind the scenes and at Basketball he has shown energy and some skill at obtaining the cooperation of others, qualities which will be useful in the Sixth next term.

My main concern is that he should take a little more time with his work. Ideas there are in plenty and he becomes frustrated if these cannot simply be turned to reality. He has lots of admirable qualities in this field which I do my best to direct.

His test performance is 30% & as I said at half term, he is well & truly heading for disaster, but is too immature to see the need for an all-out effort. He certainly asks questions in class — indeed as a member of this set, he is good value & I enjoy having him — but it's high time he did some reading & learning from his textbook.

I have been immensely heartened by his performance this term. He has opened up considerably since September and has made a really constructive contribution to discussion of the issues raised by the course. My one reservation is that he lacks the scholarship to support judgments which he arrives at through native wit. He must improve his range of reading so as to accumulate a store of knowledge on which to base his judgments and understanding. He has done well this term, and I congratulate him most warmly.

He is making efforts. I hope he will not stop just because they are slow to pay off.
